Berlin, Germany, Nov. 5.—Nicholas Romanoff, the former czar, his wife and their four daughters and only son Alexis are dead beyond any shadow of doubt. They were all executed together in Ekaterinburg on the night of July 17, 1918, and their bodies were burned. Heretofore reports of the fate of the Romanoff family all came from sources outside the soviet realm, whereas the only authoritative place to get the facts was naturally soviet Russia. Unfortunately the bolshevist leaders are reluctant to discuss the matter.

Tells the Story with Shame.

With great difficulty I succeeded in finding a responsible communist who was present at the secret session in Moscow at which the president of the Ekaterinburg soviet reported the circumstances of the Romanoff deaths. This person was Mikhail Pokrovsky, acting commissioner of education and a man of the highest integrity. He bowed his head in shame as he told me the story.

"Ekaterinburg was surrounded on three sides," he said, "when four letters written in French and signed 'officer' were found in possession of the Romanoffs. These letters proved the existence of an organized plot to kidnap the czar and his family. The local soviet then hurriedly evacuating the city took the matter up and decided to execute the czar, the czarina and all the children. The tales of torture are untrue. On the night of July 17 after a short notice the Romanoffs were taken out and shot. In order to give no opportunity to the monarchists later to sanctify the Romanoff relics and use them for counter-revolutionary agitation the seven bodies were cremated. We make no attempt to justify this horrible deed."

Letters to Czar Photographed.

Pokrovsky had photographs of the four letters showing how the attempt at escape was to be made. He also obtained the czarina's diary from January, 1918, to the day of her death. She had made the entries while in Tobolsk and Ekaterinburg.

LUDENDORFF'S OWN STORY

PERILS OF SOME BATTLE

He Realized That German Commanders Must Employ More Effective Defensive Measures.

Replacing Deep Trenches with Concrete "Pill Boxes" and Substituting Machine Guns for Brenners.

(Ludendorff's own story, as told in his book "The Last Days of the War," is a most interesting and revealing account of the military operations of the German army during the last year of the war. He describes the various battles and the tactics employed by the German command, and the changes that were made in the defensive measures as the war progressed.)
